TRIP 2017 U.S. Faculty Survey Report

1 Introduction

The Teaching, Research, and International Policy (TRIP) Project at the College of William & Mary explores the teaching and research practices of the international relations (IR) discipline to better understand help bridge the gap between theory and practice. The TRIP Faculty Survey, issued every 2-3 years, is one part of this larger project. The survey began in 2004 by sampling only scholars in the United States. The 2017 version, which is the sixth wave of the survey, expands the sample to more than 30 countries.

The TRIP Project was established in 2003 to gather data and publish analysis on the relationships between teaching, research and foreign policy. The discipline of international relations has expanded data collection efforts to capture important features of a wide array of international political problems. TRIP's original goal was to collect data on the academic discipline of international politics to gain a clear understanding of how scholars teach and research international relations, and in turn, how they influence policy.

As the TRIP Project has progressed, we have focused more on the perceived gap between the theory and practice of international relations. Our current research agenda focuses on trying to understand the relationships between IR scholarship and teaching, IR as practiced by policymakers, IR knowledge as reported in the media, and views on IR held by the public.

Our goal for data collection with the faculty survey is to compare scholarship and pedagogy to see whether or not scholars teach the same paradigms, methods, issue areas and regions that they employ and examine in their own research. We use these data to ask similar questions about the impact (or lack of impact) on the thinking of practitioners, and how IR experts can better communicate knowledge via the media to inform policymaking.

The report that follows includes both survey questions that we have included in TRIP surveys since the project's inception, such as questions about research method, paradigmatic and epistemological approach, and teaching style, as well as questions unique to the 2017 survey that gauge scholarly opinion on foreign policy issues. We first describe the method we used to collect our sample, and then we present the survey results.

2 Methods

For our U.S. faculty survey, we identified IR professors at schools by combining the schools from U.S. News & World Report's 2017 college rankings with U.S. military academies, Claremont Graduate University, and Middlebury Institute for International Studies at Monterey (which are not included in the rankings but do have political science faculty doing research and/or teaching courses on IR). We then identified IR professors at these schools through a systematic series of web searches, emails, and communications with departments and individual scholars.

In order to be considered for inclusion in the sample, scholars must meet one of the following conditions:

1. Individual is affiliated with a political science unit at a university, such as a department of government.
2. Individual is affiliated with a professional or policy school (e.g. Kennedy School of Government).
3. Individual is affiliated with a research institute at a university (e.g. Hoover Institution).

Interdisciplinary programs (e.g. Departments of Social Science) in which scholars teach or research international relations are considered. We identified all political science units within the institutions included in the sample. From there, we identified scholars with either teaching experience or research interests in IR. Research subjects are considered IR if either the independent or dependent variables cross an international border. Scholars are excluded if their teaching and research only list comparative political economy, area studies, or comparative politics. Similarly, professors who hold trans-national interests but only focus on a particular region (e.g. Latin American Politics) do not qualify.

The following principles are used to identify whether a scholar's teaching or research qualified as IR:

- Teaching: International relations is the primary theme of the course (i.e. The Politics of Global Governance would qualify as IR; a course on international law with a short discussion of global governance would not count).
- Research: The scholar must list at least one IR topic as a research interest; if no list is available, the scholar must exhibit some sustained interest in IR topics, even if those topics do not make up the majority of his/her work.

We identified a total of 4,849 individuals in the United States who met the TRIP criteria for inclusion. Of these individuals, 1,541 people answered at least one question on our survey. This gave us a response rate of $31.71 \%$. The survey was in the field October to November 2017.

5 Journals, Presses, and Rankings

- Before answering the questions in this section, respondents were randomly divided into three treatment groups that varied the order in which the following questions were presented
- The control group was immediately asked to "List four scholars whose work has had the greatest influence on the field of IR in the past 20 years" before answering any questions on citation policies.
- The gender treatment group viewed the following statement first
"A number of recent studies have highlighted the possible under-representation of female scholars in international relations, as reflected in article citations and graduate syllabi, and as a share of tenured and tenure-track faculty. Several prominent journals report taking steps to ensure that scholars receive appropriate intellectual acknowledgment regardless of their gender. To this end, these journal editors ask authors to pay particular attention to this issue by citing overlooked authors and literatures."
Respondents in this group were then asked a series of questions about this type of gender citation policy. They were then asked to "List four scholars whose work has had the greatest influence on the field of IR in the past 20 years."
- The Non-U.S. treatment group viewed the following statement first
"A number of recent studies have highlighted the possible under-representation of scholars based outside the United States, as reflected in article citations and graduate syllabi, and as a share of tenured and tenure-track faculty. Several prominent journals report taking steps to ensure that scholars receive appropriate intellectual acknowledgment regardless of their race, nationality, or university location. To this end, some journal editors have asked authors to pay particular attention to this issue by citing overlooked authors and literatures."
Respondents in this group were then asked a series of questions about this type of Non-U.S. citation policy. They were then asked to "List four scholars whose work has had the greatest influence on the field of IR in the past 20 years."
- The responses from the three treatment groups are broken out by treatment below.
- Table 26 combines all responses to get an overall top 25 ranking.
